I have never...

This is a fun game to warm up. Practical side effect: the group gets to know each other in a completely new way.

Material

- none

Implementation

- The participants form a circle of chairs. One participant remains without a chair and stands in the middle of the circle.
- This player now names one thing that they have never done in their life. Example: "I've never painted my toenails before."
- The other players who have already done this must now stand up and try to get one of the other empty seats.
- The player in the middle naturally also tries to take one of these seats.
- The remaining player now continues and names one thing he has never done.
- The players to whom the statement applies may remain seated.

Variation

- If you have several rooms available, there is an action-packed variation.
- Depending on the number of players and rooms, there are one or more chairs in the different rooms.
- The person who makes the next statement stands at the most central point possible. If possible, use a microphone so that everyone can hear the statement.
- The game works according to the same principle described above. However, as there is a longer distance to cover, the game gets more action and the fun factor increases.
